two, and the problem of educating the pesticide consumer and regulating the introduction and production of pesticides as a final part of this section.

The next section provides two papers which review quite thoroughly the status of the use of chemicals for plant disease control and for weed control, respectively. These are followed by one paper highlighting work on the organophosphorus insecticides and a second noting the remarkable progress in control of internal parasites of animals. The importance and status of pest control aspects of the large field of pest control in agriculture, and marks the progress made in the field at the time of the symposium.
